A NEW CHAPTER

Ann Bonny (1697-?): a little-known pirate. A blend of genders, transgression and rejection of norms. A genderless, protean life. Involved with John Rackham, and above all with Mary Read. She made fools of her peers and the Royal Navy. She vanished after Mary Read's death, probably in the year she turned 24.

ANN BONNY

A shape-shifting trio from France's Grand Est region. Noise, as it should be. Born from the ashes of 37500 Yens and Rhume Carabinée. Still alive.

Following directly on from Ma Secte, Ann Bonny is the result of several years of crossings and encounters. It began with 37500 Yens. Then Harpon. Then Ma Secte. Finally Ann Bonny: Franck on drums, Jud on bass, Julie on guitar, vocals and synths.

The band describe themselves as blurry-noise. More precisely: the tension of Chat Pile, melodies that brush against YC-CY, an appetite for uncertain rhythms, and everything crooked and unsettling in today's chamber-music landscape.

Ann Bonny / Nee

Harpon is no more, blown apart in mid-flight just as a new album was in the can - or nearly so. Consolation comes where it can: several members of the Reims band immediately bounce back with Ann Bonny. Different music, but the interest remains. Still rooted in noise, though on a stranger, more experimental side. Midgrave and Poor Random Melody retain that nerve and tension, the rhythms and guitar shards of noise rock, reminding us that a former member of 37500 Yens is also lurking inside Ann Bonny. Distorted, corrupted, effects-laden vocals reminiscent of Fleuves Noirs; an even hazier, more wrecked atmosphere on Jazz-X, which has nothing to do with jazz; and a simmering intensity set within a crooked yet hard-hitting framework on Match Mort. Ann Bonny's four tracks are hugely promising, and soften the sadness of knowing that Harpon have called it quits for good.
